KurzbeschreibungIn decline from terminal cancer, the author recounts an eventful life that spanned China, Taiwan, and America. He charts his family's wild swings of fortune across two generations, starting with their flight from China to escape the Communist takeover while his father, an official under Chiang Kai-shek, is in the throes of a ruinous gambling habit. Yens own life, despite his fathers counter-example, then follows a similarly erratic course. As he notes, For those of a certain castmen like my father and me impulse and destiny are alike; one is the measure of the other. Funny in parts, moving in many others, Yens memoir delivers a lifetime of observations about filial and romantic love, the ebb and flow of fortune, and the sweetness and defeat that linger at lifes end.
