interest in other cultures--their history, their faith, their music and their literature--has compelled me to read the Koran. My fear about reading the Koran in translation and with study notes by the translator is the same as my fear about people from other faiths approaching the Bible with little or no background: we are dependent on the accuracy of the translation and the faithfulness of the study notes (to an extent, and assuming we regard the notes). However, a good friend--a Muslim from Pakistan who reads the Koran in its original language and who is very orthodox in his faith--has assured me of the accuracy of this translation of the Koran. He has also strongly cautioned me about the study notes--the translator is apparently quite liberal in his understanding of the Koran. As with the Bible, so with the Koran--read it for yourself first, then go back and compare your understanding with the study notes. Perhaps you missed a concept or misunderstood a passage, and perhaps the study note itself is incorrect. Also, study the background of the text--history of doctrine, the great interpreters and theologians, etc.--the better to inform your understanding. In conclusion then, this is a fine edition of the Koran. A beautiful translation, thorough introduction to the whole Koran, brief introduction to each chapter, side-by-side English/Arabic text, exhaustive study notes, good index, and other features make this a worthy purchase. Five stars, minus one for the study notes!

Please remove The first review from "The reader from NY" Von Ein Kunde NOWHERE has the Prophet ever said "women do not go to heaven, are inferior to men". This person should be ashamed of himself, he is expressing his ignorant opinions, linking him to the name of the Prophet. These are offensive to any respected muslim.
