Fantastisches BuchVon dandelionEin, meiner Ansicht nach, wirklich bemerkenswertes Buch ber eine Frau, die von ihrem Alltag einfach genug hat (kennen wir das nicht alle?) und beschliet in eines der wenigen Lnder zu fahren fr die die Buchhandlung in der sie arbeitet keine Karten fhrt. Ihre Wahl fillt auf die Mongolei und so bricht sie zusammen mit ihrem Fahrrad Greene auf in ein Abenteuer, das mich nicht mehr losgelassen hat.Ein Kommentar auf der Buchrckseite trifft es vielleicht besser, als ich es ausdrcken knnte: "I envy Erika Warmbrunn for her beautiful, heartfelt articulation of encounters with little-known hearts and souls of Asia. Everyone should make such a journey at least once in their lives." (G. Wiltsie)In jeder Hinsicht ein empfehlenswerter Kauf fr einen Nachmittag whrend dessen man sich in fremde Welten trumen mchte!

KurzbeschreibungErika Warmbrunn's amazing 8,000 kilometer cycling journey through Asia. Winner of the Barbara Savage Miles From Nowhere Memorial Award..deLiving in Seattle and failing to make her mark as an actress, Erika Warmbrunn decides to chuck it all and go traveling. Her resulting novel, Where the Pavement Ends, is an absorbing account of her ambitious eight-month solo bicycle trip through the countries of Mongolia, China, and Vietnam. While Warmbrunn's accounts of the travails of traveling in far-off lands doesn't necessarily break new ground, she writes with humor and candor. If you have even a twinge of wanderlust, you'll appreciate this book. Her adventure begins in Mongolia, where she cycles past curious onlookers in dusty towns with names like Khatgal and Moron. Abandoning her set-in-stone itinerary, she spends a memorable month in the village of Ashaant teaching English to schoolchildren and living in a traditional ger (tent). In China she braves the cold and nerve-racking interrogation but is awed by the Great Wall and intrigued by fellow backpackers' tales, told over noodles and beer. By the time she reaches Vietnam, with the frenetic Saigon and its ever-present reminders of the war, she is psychically and emotionally spent. Four thousand miles is a long way to go--even when it's a journey in search of self. --Jill FergusKurzbeschreibungErika Warmbrunn's amazing 8,000 kilometer cycling journey through Asia.
